Drop new form item here

Make each form item feel more like a solid block, separating them more clearly from other form items. This reinforces the tactile metaphor for the drag-and-drop interface. Provide more example text such as password asterisks and sample email address to give each item a faster visual read (when you see the word “password” followed by blanked out characters, you can recognize it more quickly than reading the word “password” by itself). Rearrange the items in the palette to group similar fields together (such as text fields with text fields, number fields with number fields, limited selection fields with limited selection fields), this will help the users to find what they are looking for more quickly.

When moving items from the palette to the form section, gray out the item in the palette so that it has been visibly “taken” from the palette but do not shift other items because the palette is not missing that option, it is just currently in use. Highlight the space in the form where the new item can be placed to reinforce that the item belongs there.

New items added to the form sections start out with blank or generic default text until the user manually adds the text for the fields, so the items should open to edit mode by default as soon as they are added to the form sections. This is less confusing than having them automatically “saved” and set at their default values.
